

"What My Vote Will Mean To Me"

The 15th amendment of the constitution grants all US citizens the right to vote, which means that everyone has an equal chance to express their opinion within the government. When I think of becoming an adult, one of the most important responsibilities that I am excited to take on, is the right to vote. Having the right to vote will mean that I have a voice in my country, and I will be expected to be well informed on the matters that I vote for. It is a great responsibility that I will not take lightly, and I believe that it is a good way to encourage everyone to be educated on the relevant governmental topics of today's society.

When I am able to vote, I will also feel a great sense of maturity and of trust from society, that I am ready to make decisions that could greatly affect the future of the United States. The right to vote is not a luxury granted to all citizens in many other countries, so I will gratefully and proudly accept my duty as an American Citizen. The future of the country is put into the hands of the new generation and I think it's up to us to be aware of the importance of voting, because voting is something that gives citizens a chance to be heard and speak up for what they believe in.

Voting presents an opportunity for people to choose how their government will be run and who will be in control. Voting can change history, and every time I vote I will make sure I know the consequences of every decision I make. I look forward to becoming an active member of society and being able to make a difference. I am grateful for the sacrifices and hardships people have gone through to make voting for women, like me, possible. So, I will show my gratitude by voting wisely and doing my best to better my country, never taking my rights or freedom for granted.
