

What My Vote Will Mean To Me

There's often a misconception that voting is not important. Many citizens believe they won't make a difference if they vote or not. There's a consensus belief within the American society that voting will have little effect on their lives. But it does, because there are repercussions for having the ability to elect an individual that is a possible candidate to run our nation.

Voting to me will mean that I am taking action instead of idly standing by choosing not to do something. It means that I can take the initiative of my responsibility and influence the outcome of the elections. If I don't agree with elected politician I can use my voice to elect a politician I know will get things done. I can use it to elect a candidate that believes in the nourishment of its people. Exercising my constitutional right means that my voice can be heard because even though I am only one vote it can mean more than zero votes.

My vote to me will mean that I am holding my government responsible. The United States of America is fortunate to be a democracy which means power comes from the people. It isn't a country of dictatorship, it isn't power to the superior but rather a voice for the inferior. Voting would be making sure that ideology isn't lost, that as a collective we can stand up to choose how our country is operated and how our lives can be lived. It is my duty as a citizen to uphold my government to its promise of freedom and equality.

My vote symbolizes the freedom of our country and the importance of letting our voices be heard as our opinions take a stand in the voting polls. I can make a difference as I raise a fist in the air as representation of empowerment. I will not be silent if I know that I have the power to shift our country into a revolution even if the means are simply one vote. It's an opportunity to change America and it starts with the people.
